Ballpoint PAINT

Often referred to as Liquid Embroidery, ballpoint tube paint can be used as an alternative to stitching to draw a fine-line that mimics the look of natural embroidery on fabric. It is easy to use and will save you hours of work from typical "needle and thread" stitching projects. Works similar to a ballpoint pen. Paint dries permanent and is machine washable. Use on fabric, paper, wood, and more.

1 oz. aluminum tubes (available in 34 colors), capped with self sealing nylon ballpoint tip, contains paint that is oil based, lead-free, non-toxic, permanent, washable and dry cleanable. Tip may be removed to use paint with a brush. On a peggable 2.75" x 7" card for retail display.

The History of Aunt Martha's

In the 1930s, during the early years of the Great Depression, Jack and Clara Tillotson started the Colonial Readicut Quilt Block Company in Kansas City. The company began as a cottage industry specializing in cut-to-size quilt blocks and patches. Due to the tough economic climate it became more feasible to sell paper patterns for a dime each rather than finished quilts or pre-cut quilt kits.

The Tillotsons began advertising their designs around the country in newspapers and magazines. The ads resembled a normal newspaper column but included some charming quilt lore and instructions for buying a pattern or booklet through the mail from the couple's newly renamed business, The Colonial Company. The company's nom-de-plume, Aunt Martha, became their trademark after a Chicago editor decided the newspaper features needed a grandmotherly name with the right touch of Colonial history. Aunt Martha reminded readers of both Martha Washington and everybody's quilt-making Aunt.

As demand for the patterns grew, Jack and Clara created new designs based off antique patterns found in library books, sketches of quilts from county fairs, and mail order contests where customers would submit their personal work. They also hired professional designers, among them Marguerite Weaver, whose specialty was designing pillow slips, finger towels, and original patchwork.

The company occasionally gathered a group of single patterns into packets called Aunt Martha's Work Basket, an idea that in 1935 developed into a monthly periodical named The Work Basket.

This small publication contained patterns for all kinds of needlework: embroidery, crochet, appliqué, and quilting. In addition to "needlecraft for pleasure and profit," readers found recipes and household tips. The Colonial Company's pattern catalog and Work Basket magazine shared patterns, so a design first printed in the magazine might later appear in the catalog as an Aunt Martha pattern design.

In 1949 the company split when the Tillotson family sold the Aunt Martha arm of the business to Clifford and Alma Swenson. The Swensons renamed the company, Aunt Martha's Studios. The Tillotson family retained the Work Basket arm of the business and renamed the company, Modern Handcraft. The newly renamed publishing firm remained in Kansas City and continued to publish multiple craft and gardening magazines for many years to come. Work Basket magazine continued to feature new patterns designed by Aunt Martha's Studios.

In 1974 the Swenson's sold the business to its present owner, the Price family of Kansas City. Shortly thereafter the company was renamed, Colonial Patterns, Inc. Throughout its history, Colonial Patterns, Inc. has produced thousands of needlecraft patterns under the Aunt Martha's® trademark and continues to publish new designs for quilting, embroidery, and textile painting.

Colonial Patterns, Inc. is still located in Kansas City, Missouri, in the Historic River Market. It remains an American-owned family business.
